RECREATIONAL MARINE FISHING LICENSE

The federal government, under the Stevens-Magnuson Act, mandated that, beginning in 2010, all anglers fishing coastal waters must register with the federal government so that they could subsequently survey marine anglers to develop better estimates of recreational catch and harvest. If a state had a way of providing the federal government with a list of marine anglers, then the state could apply for an exemption to the federal registry requirement. A list of licensed anglers meets the requirement for the federal registry exemption. The federal government was prohibited from charging for this registry until 2011, but they made it clear that they would charge for the federal registry when no longer prohibited and that the revenues would go into the general federal coffers and not directed toward marine resource management. So anglers were facing a saltwater registry requirement, with a fee, or a state marine license requirement. Aiming to keep license fees in New York to fund state conservation programs rather than sending the money to the federal government, New York lawmakers approved a new state fishing license.
